Biography

Sarah Jenkins Dewey is an associate and member of Parsons Behle & Latimer's litigation practice team, where she maintains a strong motion practice, representing clients primarily in business and commercial matters. She has also represented clients in conservatorship proceedings, section 1983 claims, personal injury cases and construction litigation.

Sarah uses her extensive background in writing, research, rhetoric and editing to craft robust arguments for her clients at all stages of litigation, from pre-litigation talks to appeals. Sarah has worked with and learned from some of Utah's best legal writers, including as a clerk for Chief Justice Matthew B. Durrant of the Utah Supreme Court and Judge J. Frederic Voros, Jr. of the Utah Court of Appeals.

During law school, Sarah was editor-in-chief of the BYU Law Review, clerked for the Criminal Appeals Division of the Utah Attorney General's Office and interned for Judge Marian Blank Horn on the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. She also holds graduate degrees in literature and writing and has taught college-level classes in writing and rhetoric.

Public Records Access Motion for Summary Judgment

Parsons' client The Salt Lake Tribune asked for copies of officer interviews from the City of West Jordan, as part of a project assembling a database of Utah police involved shootings. The city refused to release the records, and The Tribune challenged that access denial in an appeal to the district court. The court issued a ruling granting the Tribune's Motion for Summary Judgment and ordered West Jordan to turn over those records, with minimal redactions.
